Foreword

The online art market remains enigmatic. Growth is slowing and the long-anticipated consolidation of an over-crowded market remains elusive, even though a sizeable 81% of platforms expect more. Lack of transparency, especially concerning pricing, seems to be the main stumbling block holding the online art market back and it's hard to see that being resolved anytime soon. In a market where everyone haggles on price, it must seem like too high a mountain to climb to publish your best price first, as we see and expect in so many other areas of online shopping.

The last year has really seen blockchain mania take off, with many claiming it can cure all the market's ills. In this report, we look at the current impact blockchain and cryptocurrencies, such as Bitcoin, are having on the online art market, as well as exploring their future potential.

Also new this year is our examination of cyber risk. The art market is dominated by small- and medium-sized businesses who have historically been at the less tech savvy, more complacent end of the scale. These businesses are vulnerable and our findings suggest that cyber criminals may be waking up to this, perhaps seeing the art market as a soft target.

Buying art continues to be hugely enjoyable and exciting (as well as occasionally frustrating) and the continued influence of social media, especially Instagram, helps fuel the growth of the market.

The future of the online art market is guaranteed, although the shape remains a mystery. In the meantime, we will continue to monitor developments and I hope that you find our report useful.

Key findings

Online sales trends

Online sales are up 12% but the annual growth rate slows further

Online art market sales reached an estimated US$4.22 billion in 2017, up 12% from the year before. This was lower than the 15% year-on-year growth rate in 2016, and 24% growth rate experienced in 2015.

Fewer people buy art online

The percentage of buyers who bought art and collectibles online in 2017 has fallen from 2016, which could suggest that the online art market is struggling to convert hesitant, as well as occasional online buyers, into repeat customers.

Confidence increases among repeat online art buyers

There are signs that active online buyers are buying more frequently and at higher prices. In 2018, the share of online art buyers paying an average price in excess of US$5,000 per fine art object increased to 25%, up from 21% in 2017.

Online art market broadens buyers' interest in cross-collecting

Almost three quarters (74%) of online art buyers bought more than one art object online in the last 12 months, and are expanding the range and type of artworks and collectibles that they buy.

Price transparency is key for new buyers

Although existing collectors are used to secrecy and a lack of transparency when it comes to pricing, this is an aspect which clearly doesn't sit well with new buyers. In this year's survey, 90% of new buyers said that price transparency was a key attribute and criteria when buying art online.

Art buyers turn channel-neutral

With 41% of buyers expressing no preference for a specific channel of purchase, there will be an increasing demand for consistent quality across both online and offline channels.

Mobile commerce gains further traction

The use of mobiles to buy art has increased significantly in recent years, rising to 20% in 2018 (up from 4% in 2015). The rise in mobile usage is in line with the near doubling of mobile web traffic from 2014 to 2018.

Instagram is the preferred social media platform for a second year

Instagram has become the art world's favourite social media platform, with 63% of survey respondents citing it as their platform of choice (up from 57% in 2017 and 48% in 2016). With close to 1 billion users, it is becoming an essential tool for the art industry in reaching consumers beyond the existing art market.

Online art platform trends

Industry consolidation is speeding up

With a number of new mergers and acquisitions taking place in the last 12 months, 81% of online platforms questioned expect to see a higher rate of consolidation in the future (up from 71% in 2017) and most (57%) expect this will be in the form of 'vertical mergers' (companies operating in different parts of the value chain).

Increasing competition expected in the online auction market

Half of all online platforms said that the online auction market was going to be the area facing the most intense competition this year. With Artsy making significant investment in the online auction business, competition with other auction aggregators such as Invaluable, LiveAuctioneers and thesaleroom.com is increasing.

Investment in deep learning and artificial intelligence

In the last 12 months, Artsy, Etsy and Sotheby's have acquired companies and teams focusing on machine learning and artificial intelligence. Could this be the latest weapon in the battle for new online buyers?

Diverging industry views on the outlook for the online market

Although 41% believe that the online art market will consolidate into only a few global platforms, another 30% believe regional and local platforms will dominate, whilst 32% believe the online art market will remain collecting category specific. The divergence in views highlights that the end-game is still open and that there is plenty to play for.

Galleries and online sales

Third-party marketplaces gain popularity

Three-quarters of galleries used third-party marketplaces to sell art online in 2018 (up from 59% in 2017 and 41% in 2016). One in five (19%) are now using these marketplaces as an outlet for at least half of their online sales (up from 3% in 2017).

Galleries recruit new clients online but loyalty is lacking

Once again, galleries report that their online buyers are mostly new clients – 73% said so this year. But loyalty remains an issue with 43% admitting repeat online buyers were rare.

Online gallery sales help broaden the international collector base

Almost three quarters (70%) of galleries this year sold their artworks online to international clients – up from 54% in 2017.

Emerging risks and opportunities: cyber crime, GDPR and blockchain

Cryptocurrencies are the predicted entry point for blockchain

While the majority (60%) of online platforms feel that cryptocurrencies as a payment method will be the way blockchain technology initially enters the online art market, only 7% currently accept cryptocurrencies as payment and only 8% have embedded blockchain technology into their businesses.

Cyber crime instills fear in online buyers

Four in ten (41%) online art buyers are 'concerned' or 'very concerned' about cyber crime when buying art online, and 82% said they would most likely buy from platforms they had prior knowledge of due to fear of cyber crime.

More than half of online platforms were targeted by cyber criminals

A worrying 54% of platforms surveyed have been the target of an attempted cyber attack in the past 12 months and around 15% said the attack had been successful.

Awareness and preparedness for GDPR is low

Despite its widespread applicability, 41% of galleries and 24% of online platforms surveyed were not aware of the new General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) and concerning numbers were unprepared for it. Coming into force on 25 May 2018, GDPR will seek to unify data standards and provide greater data protection for EU citizens.

Online art sales trends

Online art market sales up 12% to US$4.22 billion in 2017, but growth rates are slowing.

Although there was a significant spread of growth rates among the different online art sales platforms in 2017, the estimated aggregate online sales figure of US$4.22 billion shows an increase of 12%. This was lower than the 15% growth rate experienced in 2016.

Despite the online art market growing around 20-25% between 2013 and 2015 (comparable with growth rates observed in the online luxury goods industry), the last 24 months shows signs of a slowdown, perhaps as the industry struggles to broaden and grow its online client base. The transition between offline and online is proving a challenge and while parts of the industry (auction houses in particular) have been rapidly adapting to a new digital era, other areas of the industry such as galleries and dealers are still getting to grips with the digital market.

With a number of bottlenecks that still need to be effectively addressed, we estimate an average future growth rate of 15% per year. That's down from an estimate of 19.5% in last year's report and slower than the 25% growth experienced in other online luxury markets. Based on this lower growth trajectory, we could expect the online art market to be worth US$8.37 billion by 2023.

Traditional auction houses continue to grow their online presence in 2017

Whilst the global art market staged a significant recovery in 2017, growth rates varied across the online art industry, with some platforms reporting double-digit growth, whilst others saw sales levelling out. Last year, Christie's, Sotheby's and Phillips all saw global auction sales increase by 25%¹, but the growth in online sales for the auction houses was less impressive at 15.6% (up from 13.3% in 2016). Bucking this trend however, Heritage Auction – one of the largest online sales platforms for art and collectibles – saw sales grow by 25.8%, from US$348.5 million in 2016 to US$438.3 million in 2017.

Methodology and limitations: this survey was conducted in January 2018. The Hiscox online art sales platform ranking is based on the qualitative responses of 831 art buyers when asked about their visiting and purchasing habits as well as their perception and satisfaction of visiting and buying from different online art platforms mentioned in the appendix of this report. Due to the nature of the sample (77% are European and American art buyers), there is likely to be a bias towards online art platforms based in these countries, therefore the ranking is not necessarily reflective of the popularity of domestic online art platforms in countries such as China, or online platforms covering a wider collectible spectrum, and where fine art is a smaller part of the total inventory.

Christie's maintains the top spot for third year in a row

In the 2018 ranking, Christie's came out on top ahead of Artsy, Sotheby's and Artnet. Christie's has now topped the Hiscox online art platform ranking for three consecutive years, but with a slowdown in online sales registered in 2017, will it be able to hold onto this position in the coming year? Three online-only platforms and two traditional art businesses (Christie's and Sotheby's) continue to dominate the top five.

Artsy tops the peer nomination ranking

Like last year, the online art platforms were asked to nominate three peer companies they believed were the current market-leaders. Artsy was nominated the most, followed by 1stDibs and Artnet. This ranking is not dissimilar from the online platform ranking based on the consumer survey, where these three companies all appear in the top five.

Online art platform trends

Industry consolidation is hotting up

A sizable 81% of online platforms believe there will be more consolidation going forward (up from 71% in 2017), and most (57%) expect this will be in the form of 'vertical mergers' (companies operating in different parts of the value chain). In January 2018, Paddle8 announced it was merging with The Native, a Swiss technology and e-commerce company, and adopting the use of blockchain. The following month, Sotheby's announced that it had acquired Viyet, an online retailer of designer furniture, vintage and antique home goods, taking another step toward broadening its business beyond auctions and private sales to reach younger, more digitally-savvy customers. Similarly Auction Technology Group (ATG), owner of the thesaleroom.com, announced at the end of February 2018 that it had merged with the German art and antiques portal lot-tissimo.com, to enable more investment in technology and to spend more on marketing to bring in more bidders.

New partnerships between online-only and traditional art businesses

The dominant forces in the online art market have shifted in recent years, from online-only platforms towards traditional art businesses rapidly embracing technology. Heritage Auction is a prime example, having created a significant online business, which in 2017 generated half of its total sales online, accounting for US$438.3 million. If we add both Sotheby's and Christie's to this, then more than US$833 million (19.7% of total online art sales) is accounted for by these three key players alone. With online art platforms dependent on quality inventory, and the traditional art businesses in need of a strong online presence, we are likely to see increasing convergence between online-only businesses and traditional art businesses in the coming years. The growth in new partnerships between online platforms such as Artsy, Invaluable and LiveAuctioneer and traditional art businesses (auction houses and galleries) is a sign of this new industry trend.

Online auction market competition set to intensify

Half of online platforms said that the online auctions market was going to be the area facing the fiercest competition (up significantly from 27% in 2017). With Artsy making a substantial investment in the online auction business, competition with other auction aggregators such as Invaluable, LiveAuctioneers and thesaleroom.com is likely to increase. Another area where competition is likely to intensify, according to 38% of respondents, is among online gallery platforms. It was thought that all areas of the online art market included in the survey will become more competitive over the next 12 months, which could suggest an increasing convergence between the different online business models and could heighten the probability of further consolidation.

Could increasing investment in machine learning be a differentiating factor?

Using machine learning and artificial intelligence to help users navigate millions of artworks and to enhance both the search and discovery experience is becoming a priority for larger marketplaces. In September 2016, Etsy acquired Blackbird Technologies, a team focused on deep learning and artificial intelligence, to help deliver more relevant search results and a better, more personalised shopping experience. In April 2017, Artsy acquired ArtAdvisor a New York-based art technology start-up, bringing co-founder Hugo Liu onto the team as Chief Scientist. ArtAdvisor's machine learning and data insights will integrate into Artsy's platform, providing deeper understanding of the current and future art market for aspiring and seasoned collectors. In January 2018, Sotheby's followed suit when it announced the acquisition of Thread Genius, a company founded by former Spotify engineers that uses artificial intelligence to identify collector tastes and offer recommendations.

With online art platforms dependent on quality inventory, and the traditional art businesses in need of a strong online presence, we are likely to see increasing convergence between online-only businesses and traditional art businesses in the coming years.

The future: the online art market in the next five years

The end-game is still open

Industry opinion is divided over how the online art market will develop in the next five years. Four in ten (41%) online platforms believe it will consolidate into only a few global platforms, whereas 30% believe regional and local platforms will dominate. Another 32% believe the online art market will remain category-specific and there will be room for niche players in specific art and collectible segments. The divergence in views highlights that the end-game is still open and that there is plenty to play for.

The online art market will converge towards one, or only a few, global platforms.

The online art market will remain collecting-specific with certain platforms dominating specific collecting segments (such as photography, prints, furniture, design, contemporary art etc.).

32%

The online art market will remain local/regional, with local platforms (country/region) dominating the market.

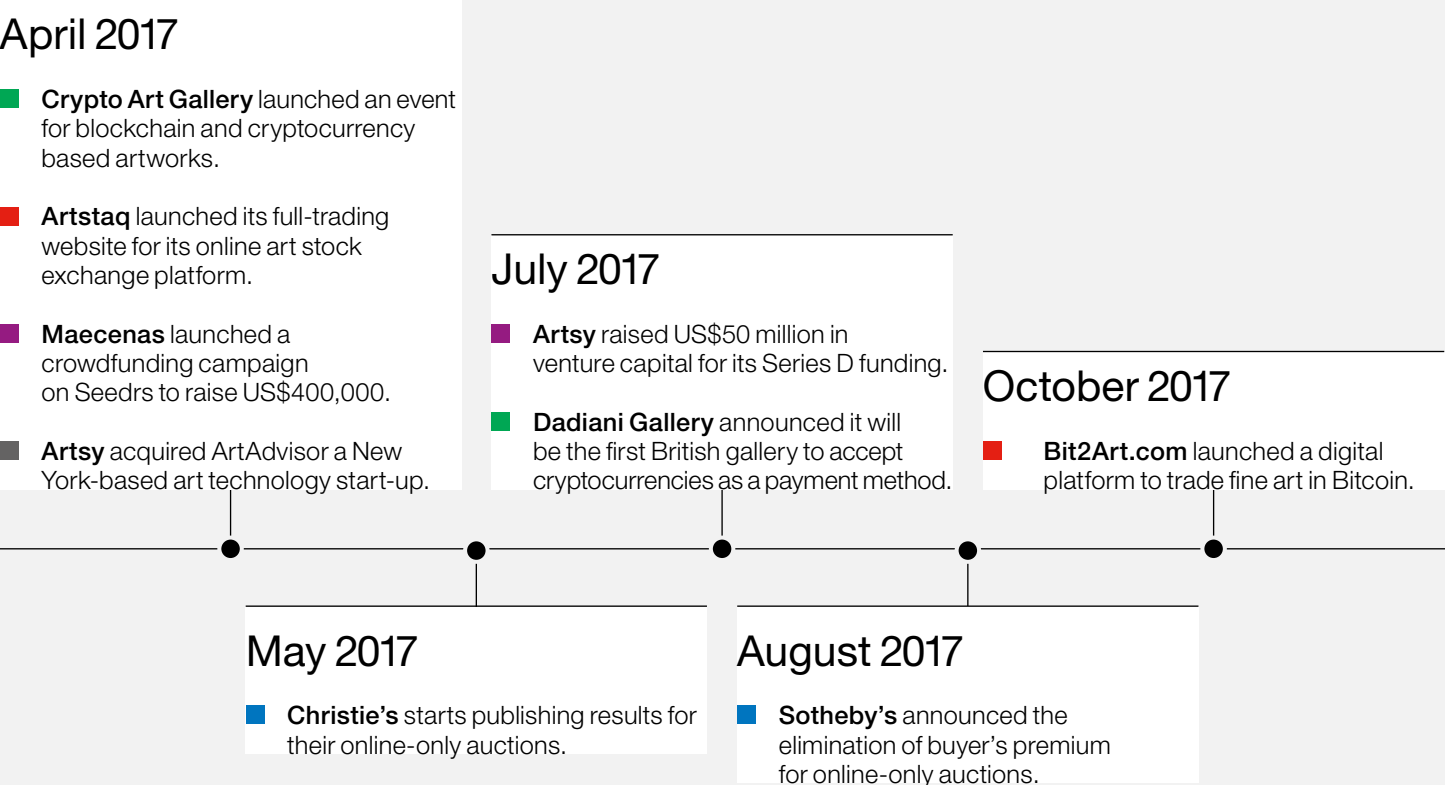

30%

It's likely that an outsider will disrupt the existing online art market (i.e. a company like Amazon, or a new start-up).

Social media trends

In January 2018 Instagram had 800 million monthly active users¹ (up 11% from January 2017) and is predicted to break through the 1 billion active users barrier by the end of 2018.

Instagram has become the art world's favourite social media platform, with 63% of survey respondents choosing it as their preferred channel for art-related purposes (up from 57% in 2017 and 48% in 2016). Although still popular, the prominence of Facebook has diminished, with only 38% of respondents citing it as their preferred social media platform (down from 49% in 2017).

So what is it that makes Instagram so popular?

The simplicity and the visual nature of Instagram is ideally suited to the art world, which combined with its mobile functionality makes it the ideal app for the art world on the move. Although many apps in the art world have been created specifically with the art world in mind, the power of Instagram is that it wasn't, and with close to 1 billion users, there is no doubt that it is becoming a very important tool for the art industry in reaching consumers beyond the existing art market.

Search and discovery

of art buyers under 35 years old use Instagram for discovering new artists.

Follow

of art buyers under 35 use Instagram to follow and keep up-to-date with artists they are already familiar with.

Buying

of art buyers said that social media had an increasing impact on their decision to buy art (this was up from 29% in 2017).

Selling

of the galleries surveyed said they actively use social media. Once again, the most popular social media platform amongst galleries is Instagram, with 62% saying so.

Instagram followers

Instagram continues to dominate social media in the art market as a prominent influencer and source of information. As the survey results suggest, the three categories with the most Instagram followers are 'museums', 'artists' and 'galleries'. Once again, in 2018 museums are the biggest players; MoMA is still the most influential art world Instagram account with 3.4 million followers (up from 2.3 million in 2017 and 1.3 million in 2016), followed by the Metropolitan Museum (2.2 million followers) and Tate with two million followers.

This year's report includes Damien Hirst in our Instagram survey; the artist has 333,000 followers (an increase of 106% since 2017) and has recently been posting more personal captions alongside images of his artworks, sharing his opinions about the 2008 Sotheby's 'Beautiful Inside My Head Forever' sale and more.

Top auction houses also experienced growth in their Instagram followings; combined, Sotheby's, Christie's and Phillips have 1.14 million followers. Although Sotheby's has the most followers (605,000), Christie's has experienced a 55% increase in followers since February 2017.

The Instagram accounts which saw the highest level of growth from 2017 to 2018 were art fairs and online art marketplaces; TEFAF experienced an 87% increase – although from a much lower follower base than with Art Basel and Frieze – SaatchiArt saw a 72% increase and ArtSpace increased by 67%. Interestingly, these companies were also in the top-four fastest growing Instagram accounts from 2016 to 2017.

Online art consumer trends 2018

Established collectors continue to embrace online

Art buyers surveyed this year visit art and collectible sales websites frequently; half visit at least once a week, which was slightly lower than last year (52%), but up from 47% in 2016. Interestingly 38% of big spenders¹ visit art and collectible sales websites several times a week (up from 31% in 2017), compared to 19% of small spenders² and 18% of new buyers³. This could indicate that existing collectors are increasingly using the online art market to search, discover, follow, and also buy art – it is becoming just another ‘channel’ for these active⁴ buyers.

Social media and word-of-mouth remain the most effective way to reach new buyers

Overall, media articles remain the most important way that people find out about art and collectible sales websites, however, this method has decreased over the last three years. For new buyers, word of mouth and social media are the most important ways to discover art and collectible sales websites, a trend we have seen since 2014. This highlights the increasing role social media plays in attracting new art buyers. See also page 14, for further social media insights.

Fewer people are buying art online

Roughly four in ten (43%) art buyers bought online in the last 12 months – down from 49% the previous year. This could signal that the conversion of offline art buyers has been slowing in the last 12 months, which is in line with the lower growth rate in online sales in 2017 (see page 4). The slowdown was particularly notable among those under 35, 36% of whom bought art online in the last 12 months, against 44% the year before. Big spenders remained active however, with 49% buying online, only marginally lower than the result 12 months ago. This negative trend could signal that more needs to be done to address the concerns that hesitant buyers have about purchasing art and collectibles online (see page 19).

Active online art buyers are buying more

Despite the overall reduction in the number of online art buyers, the survey results show that active online buyers are purchasing significantly more than in previous years, which could signal increasing levels of confidence in this channel amongst more experienced users. Three-quarters (74%) of those shopping online for art bought more than one object or collectible in 2018, significantly up from 65% in 2017 and 63% in 2016. Big spenders were prolific buyers of multiple items, with 13% making six to ten online purchases and 18% buying more than ten items in the last 12 months. It looks like this trend is set to continue, as 90% of online customers anticipated buying the same or more art online in the next 12 months.

Online auctions remain the most popular channel for buying art, although online gallery platforms are gaining traction among the young

Online auction aggregators have seen the biggest increase with 34% having bought from them (up from 20% in 2017), although these are still less popular than online-only auctions (45%) and bricks-and-clicks (41%). Online marketplaces are most popular with new buyers and small spenders, representing 53% and 49% respectively. Gallery portals are also gaining in popularity, particularly with under 35s – 45% bought using this method (up from 29% in 2017).

Online art buyers are increasingly ‘platform-hopping’

2018 saw an increase in the number of online platforms used to purchase art; 81% bought from more than one online platform (up from 77% in 2017 and 73% in 2016), and 10% used more than five. Over half (53%) of big spenders bought from three or more online platforms compared with only 10% of small spenders. The rise in the number of online platforms individual buyers use again highlights the comfort that collectors now feel with the online art market, but also presents a challenge for online platforms in terms of maintaining customer loyalty.

Online platforms act as the entry point for new buyers

Only 67% of new buyers and 59% of small spenders bought from a physical space before buying online, compared with 88% overall. This stands in stark contrast with big spenders, 100% of whom bought from a physical space before buying online.

Price transparency is key for new buyers

Although existing collectors are used to secrecy and non-transparency when it comes to pricing, this is an aspect which clearly doesn’t sit comfortably with new buyers. In this year’s survey, 90% of new buyers and 92% of small spenders said that price transparency was a key consideration when buying art online. The decision taken by Christie’s to publish its online auction results seems to be a move in the right direction, although a large number of online auction providers still refuse to share their results with the public. As the industry matures and confidence in online buying and selling increases, it is highly likely that we will see much more price and transaction transparency than is currently the case.

¹ Individuals who spend more than US$100,000 a year on purchasing art both offline and online.

² Individuals who spend less than US$1,000 a year on purchasing art both offline and online.

³ Art buyers that started collecting art less than three years ago.

⁴ Active online buyers are defined as individuals who have bought art online in the last 12 months.

The increasing importance of mobile commerce

A shift from tablet to mobile has occurred. As the use of the tablet to buy art has decreased, the use of a mobile has increased significantly, rising to 20% in 2018 (up from 4% in 2015). The rise in mobile usage is in-line with the near doubling in mobile web traffic from 2014 to 2018⁵. This means that catering for mobile users carries increasing importance for reaching and engaging with potential customers.

What are people buying online?

Increasing confidence results in higher average prices online

In 2018, the share of online art buyers paying an average price in excess of US$5,000 per fine art object has increased to 25%, up from 21% in 2017. This year, 14% said they paid between US$5,000 and US$10,000 for fine art objects on average, an increase from 9.9% in 2017.

Buyers broaden their interest in cross-collecting

Paintings and prints remain the preferred medium with online art buyers, but all collecting segments have increased in popularity. As the majority of buyers now make multiple purchases, they are also expanding the range and type of artworks that they buy.

New media art finds a foothold in the online art market

New media art, such as video or digital art is gaining popularity among online art buyers, with 17% now buying this medium compared with 12% in 2014. Repeat purchases are also on the rise; 58% bought two to five pieces and 17% bought over 21 items, compared to 2017 when 50% only bought one item. The average price of new media art has also increased with 27% of buyers paying over US$1,000 on average, up from 17% in 2017.

Photography collectors are increasingly active online

As we have seen in the last 12 months, multiple online purchases of fine art are on the rise. Across all mediums there was an increase in the number of people purchasing 21 or more artworks, and a decrease in the number of people only purchasing one artwork. There was a particularly marked increase in those purchasing multiple photographs; 17% of photography buyers bought over six items in 2018, up from 6% in 2017.

In 2018, the share of online art buyers paying an average price in excess of US$5,000 per fine art object has increased to 25%, up from 21% in 2017.

Gallery trends

A gentle rise in online sales

As a percentage of their overall business, galleries surveyed are seeing online-driven sales (defined as sales sight-unseen either through their website, third-party platforms, or social media) grow slowly. In 2018, online sales accounted for 29% of total gallery sales (up from 28% in 2017 and 24% in 2016).

Gradual uptake of e-commerce

Almost a third (32%) of galleries surveyed¹ offer clients the opportunity to buy selective artworks and pay directly online through their website. This number has risen from just 22% in 2013.

Third-party marketplaces gather momentum

Three quarters of galleries used third-party marketplaces to sell art online in 2018 (up from 59% in 2017 and 41% in 2016). And with almost a fifth (19%) now generating more than half of their online sales through third-party sellers, (up from just 3% in 2017), these marketplaces are proving to be an effective sales platform for a significant minority.

Online gallery sales attract an increasingly international collector base

A significant proportion (70%) of galleries this year said they sold their artworks online to international clients (those based outside the country), up from 54% in 2017 and 52% in 2016.

Customer loyalty is lacking

Despite the increasing number of new clients recruited online, there are signs that galleries are struggling to turn these into loyal, repeat buyers. This year, 43% of galleries admitted that they are not seeing repeat customers online (up from 40% in 2017 and 41% in 2016).

Online sales as a percentage of total sales (%)

Online sales for galleries were defined as as sales sight-unseen either through their website, third-party platforms, or social media.

¹This result might reflect the nature of the gallery sample, which consisted predominantly of smaller to mid-tier galleries, where online sales is likely to play a bigger role than for the higher-end galleries.

Key challenges in growing the online art market

Focus on building consumer trust

More than half (59%) of online platforms said that the greatest challenge in the online art market currently is building consumer trust. Below is a summary of some of the key reasons why building trust is a challenge, and also an outline of some of the trends and developments taking place to address this.

	Future	Solution
 Price transparency <ul style="list-style-type: none"> — 89% of art buyers say price transparency is a key criterion when buying art online. This was higher for new buyers, where 90% said price transparency was essential when buying art online. It shows that transparency is an essential tool in building confidence when buying art online. — 73% of new buyers said they would like to have access to comparable transactions/past prices. 	If the online art market is to grow further, the issue of price transparency needs to be addressed. More sophisticated price and object comparison tools need to be made available to online consumers during the search and discovery process.	The online art consumer will increasingly push for price transparency in the online art market. The advent of big data combined with artificial intelligence could present more sophisticated ways of understanding and measuring the value of an art object.
 Quality <ul style="list-style-type: none"> — 94% of art buyers say the quality of art on offer is essential when buying art online. This is even higher for buyers under the age of 35, where 95% said the quality of artworks on offer was very important. — 84% of hesitant online buyers said that a certificate of authenticity, and 89% said a condition report, would incentivise them to buy art online. 	The challenge of the future will be to maintain quality as the online art market continues to grow. The responsibility of online platforms to monitor and to ensure that authenticity, provenance and condition are accurate, will prove critical in building trust and credibility with new and existing buyers.	New tools for tracking and identifying fakes and copyright infringements, as well as new innovation based on blockchain and new technology around tagging and identification of artworks, could become key catalysts maintaining trust and credibility in the online art market.
 Fulfilment <ul style="list-style-type: none"> — 37% of art buyers say that the cost and complications around shipping and logistics are the main challenges when buying art online (up from 33% in 2017). — 48% of the online platforms (up from 19% in 2017) said that logistics (fulfilment and delivery) was one of the current key challenges. — 77% of art buyers said that a return guarantee would encourage them to buy art online. 	With Amazon Prime pushing logistics and fulfilment to a new level, the expectations (and impatience) of online consumers is growing rapidly. It's important that the online art market doesn't fall behind in this development. Art logistics is a highly specialised service and it will need to find a way to meet the potential growth (and heightened expectations) of the online art buyer.	Already there are new tech businesses, such as ArtRunners, aimed at aggregating the fragmented landscape of art shipping and logistics providers. The existing logistics giants such as Amazon, UPS and FedEx are already getting prepared. The UPS Store and FedEx offer art and museum services.

Cryptocurrencies and blockchain

Can blockchain succeed in bringing a fragmented art industry together?

Does the advent of blockchain, coupled with rapid growth in companies and new applications built on this technology, offer the potential to address the friction around quality assurance, price transparency and fulfilment?

The answer is yes. However, its success relies on the willingness of existing stakeholders and operators in the art market to adapt, build and utilise this new technology. There are several aspects which make blockchain attractive to the art market, one of these being a global register for art objects (title registry). Features such as high security (cryptography), anonymity, the ability to combine open data and secure data, and a decentralised rather than a centralised national register, could all be accommodated by blockchain technology.

With such an infrastructure in place, further data and information, such as transaction prices, valuations, provenance, condition and shipping reports could be added. In fact, an entirely new art service eco-system could be built on and around the blockchain, enabling new markets to emerge, fuelled and enforced by 'smart contracts'.

But how imminent is this? The fact that blockchain is open source means it could grow fast, and although it currently feels a bit like the internet in the early 1990s, we are likely to see an exponential rise in new businesses, applications and solutions built on this technology in the coming years.

For this we still need human expertise and knowledge, combined with science and data. We also need to be able to link the actual object through a 'unique identifier' with the blockchain itself. But when these obstacles are solved (and there are a number of companies already working on these aspects) it could unlock a series of other possible scenarios for adding other attributes to the object, such as title, provenance, transaction prices, valuations, condition reports and so on.

It is important that blockchain is viewed as an enabler, not a solution for solving fundamental problems in the art market, such as authenticity or valuation.

It is crucial however, for the integrity of this eco-system to ensure that the quality of information added to the blockchain is verifiable and of the highest quality – one could foresee a new quality standard industry developing to ensure this is the case. The saying 'garbage in, garbage out' still holds true in a blockchain system.

Blockchain trends

of online platforms felt that using blockchain as a title/ownership registry for the art and collectibles market was going to be the most successful use of blockchain technology in the future.

60%

of online platforms feel that using cryptocurrencies as a payment method will be the way blockchain technology initially enters the online art market.

19%

of online art platforms surveyed believe blockchain technology will be among the most competitive areas of the online art market in the coming 12 months.

8%

of online art sales platforms have already embedded blockchain technology into their businesses and a further 38% are thinking about doing so.

7%

of online art sales platforms surveyed accept cryptocurrencies as payment for artworks, and 22% are planning to accept cryptocurrencies in the next 12 months.

Blockchain-based art start-up companies and initiatives

Company	Description
ArtByte	ArtByte is a cryptocurrency which allows collectors to buy artworks directly from artists using ArtBytes which they can mine on artbyte.me.
ArtChain	ArtChain has a Bitcoin blockchain database which authenticates art by proving chain-of-ownership and providing certificates of authenticity.
Artmyn	Has developed a technology around Digital Fingerprint (DNA of an artwork) through a scanning process.
Artory	Building a blockchain database of artwork information.
Ascribe	Platform and online marketplace for digital artworks. Artists can upload their artworks and transfer their intellectual property to the buyers of their artworks.
Bit2Art.com	Digital platform for trading in fine art in Bitcoin and a secure storage facility, shipping and insurance consultation.
Codex	Blockchain-based decentralised title registry for art and collectibles.
CryptoPunks	Digital collectibles paid for with cryptocurrencies.
Deloitte ArtTracktive	Developed in 2016 as a 'proof of concept' (POC) to demonstrate how blockchain could be applied in the art market.
Maecenas	Aims to issue cryptographic certificates against an artwork which, when bought, allow investors to own part of an artwork, and which can be traded on the Maecenas exchange platform.
Monegraph	The Monegraph blockchain platform allows artists to sell and authenticate their artworks.
Paddle8	Paddle8 merged with Swiss company Native to introduce blockchain-based sales and its first sale to accept Bitcoin will be in August 2018.
Provenire Authentication	The Provenire Sticker uses synthetic DNA polymers to specifically and uniquely mark artwork.
Tagsmart	Provides artworks with 'DNA tags' which identify, seal and verify the authenticity of artworks, issues certificates of authenticity and an online provenance record.
The R.A.R.E. Network	Uses the blockchain to create verifiable scarcity for digital art prints and uses RARE Token to pay bounties to the community for flagging spam and fraud in the R.A.R.E. Registry.
Verisart	Using blockchain to create certificates of authenticity for artworks and adds provenance to a permanent, decentralised and anonymous ledger.
ZenDao	ZenDao tokenises artworks to link them to their blockchain database designed to make the transfer of ownership and transactions quicker and easier.

Cyber crime and GDPR

At this year's World Economic Forum in Davos, a key agenda item was cyber security. Cyber security risks are growing, both in their prevalence and disruptive potential. Attacks against businesses have nearly doubled in the last five years¹, and incidents that would once have been considered extraordinary are becoming more and more commonplace. The financial impact of cyber security breaches is also rising.

So what are the concerns and how ready is the online art market to address cyber crime? The most recent Hiscox Cyber Readiness Report² showed that seven-in-ten companies were not cyber-ready, with smaller companies in particular lacking the resources to implement a proper cyber strategy.

There is no doubt that cyber crime is also of increasing concern among art buyers, galleries and online art platforms.

As with other industries, there are key questions around the readiness of the sector to protect itself against cyber crime, and with values in art on the increase, it is likely that the art market (both online and offline) could become a desirable target for criminal activity.

Concerns

of art buyers said they would most likely buy from online art platforms they had prior knowledge of, i.e. through friends or in the media, due to fear of cyber crime.

36%

of art buyers were 'concerned' or 'very concerned' about cyber crime when registering for online art websites and platforms.

41%

of online art buyers were 'concerned' or 'very concerned' about buying and transacting art online.

41%

of galleries surveyed were 'concerned' or 'very concerned' about cyber crime.

19%

of online platforms were 'concerned' or 'very concerned' about cyber crime.

Type of cyber crime

of galleries have been the target of an attempted cyber attack in the past 12 months although only 10% of these said the attack had been successful.

30%

of galleries said that viruses were the most common cyber crime, followed by data breaches (15%), distributed denial of service attacks (12%), ransomware attacks (9%) and wire transfer fraud (4%).

of platforms surveyed have been the target of an attempted cyber attack in the past 12 months, although only 15% said the attack had been successful.

36%

of online platforms said that the most common cyber crime was a distributed denial of service attack, followed by email account takeover/impersonation (29%) and viruses (21%).

General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR)

The introduction of the GDPR in May 2018 aims to bring a unified approach to data protection across the whole of the EU. Giving EU citizens greater control over their data, the challenging new regulation applies to all companies – large and small – handling or holding the personal data of EU residents. Those that don't comply could face fines of up to €20 million or 4% of group worldwide turnover (whichever is greater), so how ready is the art market for the arrival of GDPR?

Awareness

of galleries and 24% of online platforms surveyed were not aware of the new GDPR rules.

34%

of galleries and 7% of online platforms were aware, but did not know how to prepare for the regulation or understand the implications it could have on their business.

78%

of galleries surveyed and 41% of online platforms surveyed were unaware of the fines for non-compliance.

Implementation

of galleries surveyed are or intend to be GDPR compliant by the deadline in May. 23% are currently compliant with GDPR and a further 41% are putting procedures in place to meet the May 2018 deadline. However, 18% of galleries believe they are unlikely to meet the deadline.

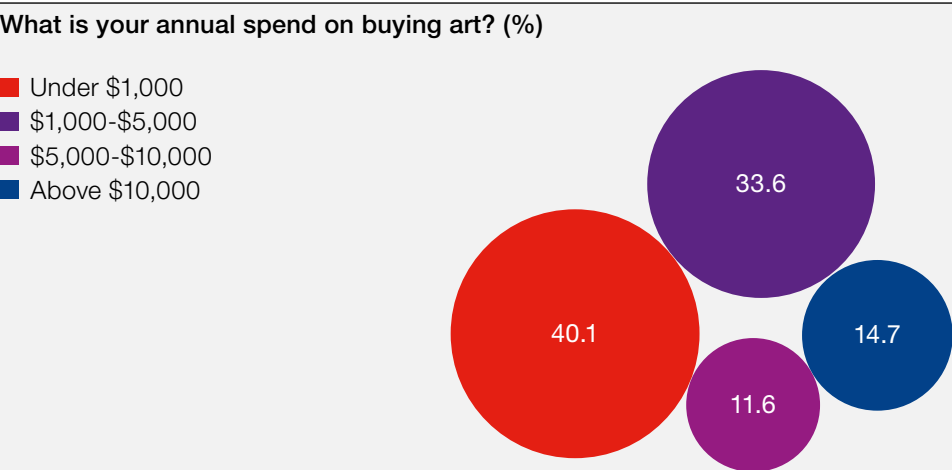

96%

of online art platforms surveyed are or intend to be GDPR compliant by the deadline in May. 31% are currently compliant with GDPR and a further 65% are putting procedures in place to meet the May 2018 deadline.

Methodology

The survey findings are based on responses from 831 art buyers surveyed through ArtTactic's client mailing list. This was up from 758 respondents in 2017.

Like last year, most of the survey respondents participated in this year's survey as well. However, the sample has been broadened by particularly focusing on new art buyers. This has allowed us to get a better idea of current online buying trends and behaviour among this next generation of buyers, and to better understand their concerns and future expectations with regards to buying art online. Although the central focus is around fine art, we have in this survey also explored online buying habits of other collectibles.

For this report we also surveyed 130 galleries and dealers (slightly down from 132 in 2017) representing a wider range of art and collectibles. Over half (60%) of these galleries were linked to contemporary art, whilst 40% represent a wider selection of dealers in different collectible areas (such as photography, modern and impressionist art, design, furniture, decorative art, antiquities, and old masters). The large majority of these galleries were smaller- to mid-tier galleries, and the findings need to be viewed in this context.

This year's report also includes the survey feedback from management and key staff of the online art platforms participating in this research. In January and February 2018, ArtTactic conducted 45 one-to-one interviews and online surveys (from a total population of 66 companies profiled in the appendix).

Christie's, as an early adopter of online sales, has successfully embedded the online platform within the specialist departments sales calendar, ensuring year-round auctions sourced by the teams from around the world. All objects are appraised and valued by Christie's specialists and carry the same guarantees of authenticity as any object sold at Christie's. Increased focus and curation of online sales meant that while there were 85 in 2017, compared to 118 in 2016 – online sales were up 12% and sell through rates by lot online averaged 82%, up from 77% in 2016. This platform continues to be the largest entry point for new buyers to Christie's (37%), with the value of lots in online sales averaging US$7,305 (up from US$6,047 in 2016). The ratio of buyers and bidders to lots offered for online sales is double offline auctions. Since May of 2017, all sold prices are published to further align our auction platforms and ensure increased transparency and confidence for both our consignors and our buyers. The top online lot for 2017 was a Rolex Submariner 6538 which sold for $324,500 in October. The highest grossing sale online this year was the First Open Picture sale in July in New York which totalled US$3,833,375. Buyers from Asia in online sales rose by 23%, driven by purchases of Asian art and luxury goods. There were 15 Asian art sales held online last year, including the 'Art of China' series, which averaged a 92% sell-through rate by lot and the value of Asian art sold online increased by 32%. In 2018, Christie's will focus on continuing to improve services to our customers, especially online.

Lot-tissimo
Website:	www.lot-tissimo.com
Founded:	2002
Location:	Hamburg
Founder:	Jörg Wisniewski
Management:	Jörg Wisniewski
Business model:	Aggregator of catalogues of classic auctions

Unlike many other online platforms Lot-tissimo started without online sales and added live bidding seven years ago. Lot-tissimo specialises in absentee bids (commission bids), which they collect from bidders and forward to traditional auction houses. Auction houses pay a fee for their catalogues on Lot-tissimo. There is no commission for absentee bids. Safe commission bids are strongly increasing, in 2017 by more than 200%. Bidders who cannot be online to bid live leave safe commission bids which are executed on their behalf through the live system. Knowing that the auctioneer will not know their highest amount, we are seeing bids about two-times higher than regular commission bids. Lot-tissimo had €197 million worth of absentee bids (not the same in sales) in 2016.

Website:	www.ocula.com
Founded:	2010
Location:	Hong Kong, London, New York, Shanghai and Auckland
Founders:	Simon Fisher and Christopher Taylor
Business model:	Online gallery, art media platform and private sales/advisory Ocula is a global portal that offers access to the programmes of leading contemporary galleries and perspectives on contemporary art and visual culture. With a global editorial perspective emanating from the Asia Pacific region, Ocula explores the galleries, people, ideas and events that shape contemporary art worldwide. Over the last year we have had a significant increase in organic applications for gallery membership with Ocula, particularly from North America and Europe. Most recently galleries like Hauser & Wirth, Thomas Dane, Marianne Boesky, Lisson, Andrew Kreps, Kewing and Zeno X have joined, in addition to many others of this calibre. We now have a selection committee of influential gallerists (including Tina Kim from Tina Kim Gallery in New York, Cristobal Riestra of OMR in Mexico City, Taka Ishii from Tokyo, Simon Devolder of Xavier Hufkens and Katherine Schaefer from Simon Lee gallery) who assess all gallery membership applications. Unlike other platforms Ocula is selective, exclusive and membership is limited to only a limited amount of leading contemporary galleries worldwide. The Ocula platform is focused on the primary contemporary art market and does not host online auctions or report on the auction market. Ocula has also continued to build strong partnerships including the Sydney Biennale, Art Asia Archive, and various top-level art fairs around the world. Our online magazine is now headed by Stephanie Bailey who leads the Conversations at Art Basel Hong Kong, the magazine is very well known and read for its great interviews and insightful conversations.

Saffronart		17
Website:	www.saffronart.com
Founded:	2000
Location:	Mumbai (main office)
Founders:	Minal and Dinesh Vazirani
Management:	Minal and Dinesh Vazirani (co-founders) and Hugo Weihe (CEO)
Business model:	Online and live auctions in modern and contemporary art, classical Indian art and Asian art, folk and tribal art, jewellery, design and collectibles, exhibitions, private sales, prime property sales

Founded in 2000 by Minal and Dinesh Vazirani, Saffronart is a leading international auction house with deep Indian roots, and is India's most reputed, with over a hundred auctions to its credit. It is headquartered in Mumbai, with offices in New Delhi, London and New York. At the forefront of selling Indian art, Saffronart holds online and live auctions, exhibitions, and prime property sales throughout the year. Saffronart's focus is to bring transparency to the auction process, and to provide easy access to bidders around the world. Saffronart's services go beyond auctions to include private sales, art storage, appraisals and valuations for clients, and supporting the efforts of the Indian art world by holding fundraiser auctions. Saffronart has set several global benchmarks for online auctions, and was the subject of a case study at Harvard Business School in 2005. Saffronart continued to dominate the market for Indian art in 2017. In September 2017, an expansive blue oil on canvas by V S Gaitonde earned a place among the top-five most expensive paintings by the artist sold worldwide at auction. Saffronart's leadership is further bolstered by its successful expansion in other categories. Known for its auctions of antiquities, design and jewellery, Saffronart organised a jewellery conference, the Timeless Legacy of Indian Jewels, to initiate a dialogue on India's rich and complex design heritage, and the art and history of adornment. The first of its scale in India, the conference featured speakers of international renown who were experts in the field and received an overwhelming response. Following its success, Saffronart will continue holding a biannual conference under its 'Dialogues in Art' series.
